This is classified as a: Coaching skills development

About this event:

Coaching is sometimes described as a 'partnership' involving 'dancing in the gap' (between current state and desired state) but most coaching conversations take place with both partners seated throughout the session.

This workshop is aimed at coaches who want to significantly improve the effectiveness of their coaching conversations. The session will be interactive and will build on the knowledge and experience in the room. It will be practical and every coach will go away with some ideas they can implement immediately.

In most coaching conversations 'time' is surfaced as a major obstacle or potential resource, but could it be that, without realising it, the coach and coachee have fundamentally different perceptions about time?

You will learn:

The advantages of inviting the coachees to get off their butts and harness the power of the space around them.

By the end of this session, you will be able to:

- (a) Appreciate the severe limitations of most current coaching conversations
- (b) Realise why physical movement is important
- (c) Recognise many coaching topics where physical movement and the use of space would be beneficial
- (d) Spot opportunities to use objects as an aid in coaching
- (e) More fully understand your perception of time and instances when this might be different to the coachee's.
